The unsatisfying riposte to all these solutions may be that we simply have to wait for true network decentralization and wholesale democratic network governance. True decentralization often emerges from the roots of centralization, and in order to reach the next phase in decentralized networks, a period of centralization may be first necessary.

The paradox of civil service reform is that democratisation may be best achieved through the centralised structure which it will ultimately undermine. Proper ordering of the reform process will use the strong culture of centralised, hierarchical institutions to instill democratic training: democratisation should precede decentralisation.

Democratic decentralization is the process of devolving the functions and resources of the state from the centre to the elected representatives at the lower levels so as to facilitate greater direct participation of citizens in governance. Devolution, envisioned by the Constitution, is not mere delegation.
